

Teens seek answers

... to questions they won't ask

Body issues
Bullying
Drugs
Depression

In every generation teens face personal challenges, but today's young people are far more likely to go online for their answers.

Recent research from the Pew Internet and American Life Project concludes that 31% of teens seek health-related information online, and an additional 17% search for information related to sensitive personal issues. When too frightened or embarrassed to approach a parent, peer or counselor, teens risk exposure to possibly unverified or even dangerous content from the open Web.

Give them information they can trust

Gale, a part of Cengage Learning, offers resources to help teens find answers confidentially and share experiences safely.
