

White Americans Must Build Separate Communities

John Hunt Morgan

John Hunt Morgan is the pen-name for a racially conscious author.

White families need an environment peopled by others like them. A step toward this goal is home schooling children, but this is not enough. Racially conscious whites must seek to establish communities in which they control the local government. They will then be able to create, without violence, overwhelmingly white communities in which their children can thrive.

How can we give our children a proper start in life? In the October 2001 issue of AR [American Renaissance] there is an excellent article about rearing honorable white children. [Professor] Robert Griffin of the University of Vermont profiled a number of families that have taken their racial responsibilities seriously, and who have arranged their households so as to instill sound racial and cultural values. These are inspiring stories, and the children will no doubt benefit greatly. However, these families all did something not all families can do: They taught their children at home rather than send them to school.

Home schooling is, of course, the only way to control what children learn, but not every family can do it. Even if an adult is home all day, not all parents or children are temperamentally suited to home schooling. Also, a single, self-contained family is not a community. Children need playmates.

John Hunt Morgan, "Building White Communities," American Renaissance, vol. 15, no. 11, November 2004. www.amren.com. Reproduced by permission.

A Healthy Atmosphere for Whites

What would be ideal is a place where the neighbors think as we do, and where the school teachers, the mayor, and the fire chief do, too. We need a community of racially conscious whites who build—simply by being together—the healthy atmosphere whites used to take for granted.

As a father, I am particularly conscious of the benefits such a community would have for children, but it would have great benefits for adults, too. How pleasant it would be for a neighborhood get-together to feel like an American Renaissance conference. At the last conference I attended, someone said to me, “It’s great to be among the living again.” It would be wonderful to live among the living.

The most important aspect of such a community would be the education it offered children. Any group that is out of step with the mainstream in any fundamental way—and, for the time being, racially conscious whites are radically out of step—must be able to rear children in a way that supports dissident thinking.

[The Amish] have been very successful in preserving a way of life completely at odds with the rest of America.

Would it be difficult to gather together the nucleus of such a community? Certainly it would, but it would be easier than electing a racially healthy Congress or state legislature. At the same time, even a small zone of healthy white consciousness could become a base for efforts at achieving larger changes. Sooner or later, whites will form communities of their own, and the sooner we begin, the more successful we will be.